But that agency is also responsible for ensuring that food reaches the shelves without incident, and that responsibility has grown so large that it is often referred to as the FDA's "dual mission." Under legislation that passed the House this week and is now in the Senate, the dual-mission of oversight of food safety and enforcement of food regulations would be entrusted to the Agriculture Department. Specifically, lawmakers would create a new role within the department, referred to as the Food Protection Administrator, that would be tasked with enforcing rules requiring that ground beef be labeled as either "beef" or "beef flavor," that seafood be sold by weight, and that fresh and frozen egg products be labeled as "eggs." This legislation also creates the role of Office of Food Safety, which would assume oversight of the safety of the American food supply, such as the safety of restaurant food, imported products and fruits and vegetables. Two of the bills in Congress, authored by Senator Pat Roberts, a Kansas Republican, and Representative Rosa DeLauro, a Connecticut Democrat, both in the Senate, and Representative Peter Welch, a Vermont Democrat, in the
