The aim of this study was to evaluate whether extracorporeal shock wave therapy (ESWT) is effective for patients with musculoskeletal pain. The Cochrane Library, MEDLINE, EMBASE, AMED, Scopus, and CINAHL databases were searched for articles published until June 2009. Studies were included if they were randomized or quasi-randomized clinical trials that tested ESWT for patients with musculoskeletal pain. Twenty-two studies (n = 1637) met the inclusion criteria. One trial found a significant reduction in pain in the ESWT group as compared with the sham treatment group, but 2 studies found no significant difference between treatment and control groups. The presence of a treatment-specific adverse effect increased the odds of pain being reduced by at least 50% with ESWT; most commonly, inflammation. Substantial heterogeneity was present in the reviewed studies; a lack of study quality was present in most studies, and several other methodological issues were found. The overall findings suggest that ESWT is not effective for musculoskeletal pain. It is likely that the significant heterogeneity across studies indicates that different ESWT protocols can have a significant influence on the outcomes of the intervention. Further welldesigned randomized controlled trials with sufficient sample size and blinding of patients and assessors to the treatment condition are needed to establish the efficacy of ESWT
